The panels are so constructed that when the panels are folded together, the edges are aligned to fit together. The main purpose of this construction is to provide a strong panel which, when assembled together, is structurally sturdy. To this end, the edges of the glass or the like are often coated with suitable adhesives to assure that they do not come loose or fall off. These type of products are commonly used in vehicles. For example, known commercial side windows and rear windows for motor vehicles are assembled from two facing sheets of glass with an interlayer of material between the layers of glass. The outer edges of the windows are usually held together by a molding or frame around the outer edges of the windows. This framing works well for locating and securing the windows. This framing however, is complicated and expensive. Additionally, the framing is generally more expensive than the construction of the glass without the frame. One early attempt to solve this problem is described in the U.S. Pat. No. 1,922,931 which issued to Anderson. Anderson describes a window unit having an outer frame and an inner, insulating sheet. The inner sheet can be a panel of glass or other transparent material. The inner panel can be held in the outer frame in such a manner that the inner and outer frames are in compressive engagement with each other. The inner panel has at least one corner which is somewhat flexible or malleable. This corner corner is curved inwardly towards the frame and when the frame is pushed upon the inner sheet, the corner bends or flexes so that the frames fit snugly with each other. Although the device of Anderson provides a unitary frame and window, it does not provide a strong frame and thus is not suitable for motor vehicle applications. In addition, it appears that the frame is rigidly attached at the corners of the outer panel and cannot fold over the corners of the inner panel for further positioning the inner and outer panels. Another problem with the device of Anderson is that the materials used to make the window (including the frame and the glass) can be expensive, especially when they are to be used in commercial and motor vehicle applications. Accordingly, there is a need for a window assembly which can be easily, cheaply and quickly produced and which will function
