Having just run into a difficult bit of timing and thresholding, I was surprised that adding a third input channel to my PWM design to send a signal that would simply force the PWM to switch on every cycle was not enough to cause the timing to fail. My resulting circuit is this: The only changes were to the BJT transistors and resistors and the addition of a fixed current source to send a positive signal along to pin A. I expected the timing to be identical to the previous, which is here. However, when I ran it and timed the pulse, it was clear that the timing was vastly different. The pulses are out of time, and I can see in the scope that the output pulses are much closer together than I would expect. The only real differences between the two versions are the BJT transistors and a couple of changes to the resistors and fixed current source. How is it that the third input channel I added can be so disruptive to the timing of the PWM? A: I'm not a fan of R's for RC time constants, but if you have a resistor from one side to the other, then I don't see a problem. You might be using a pull-up for the output, and if so, make sure your PWM output swings before the pull-up allows the BJT to turn off. I'm also not sure you need a level shifter at all. Your current loop design would keep changing resistors for the output driver, which I think would be a problem. For example, when I was getting into PWM, my first circuit was this: simulate this circuit - Schematic created using CircuitLab simulate this circuit

Your PWM time would have to be exactly  $1/(2 * 10^{-3} * 2^9)$  seconds. The output would be on for  $2 * 10^{-3}$  seconds, then off for  $2^9$  seconds. So  $1/(2 * 10^{-3} * 2^9)$  seconds is your required duty cycle. In the picture above, the time on for the output is less than the time off for the output.
