The three major risk factors for NF are recent (less than two weeks) surgery, diabetes mellitus, and perineal trauma. The incidence of NF in the United States is approximately 5 per 100,000 persons per year with mortality rates of 29%-46%.¹ Although most cases of NF are due to infection with group A Streptococci, an increasing number of cases are now attributable to beta-hemolytic streptococci (GBS), especially Group B.2-4 Risk for NF is greatest in those persons with poor prognostic features: perineal trauma, diabetes mellitus, and recent surgery. Early recognition of NF is important to ensure optimal management of this potentially fatal disease. Proteins with direct metal-binding sites have been implicated in important cellular processes. An example of a protein with a metal ion associated with it in vivo is spermidine-spermine N1-acetyltransferase (SSAT) the expression of which is up-regulated in most human tumors and in vitro transformed cells. SSAT catalyzes the acetylation of N1-acetylspermidine and N1-acetylspermine, which are polyamines and important regulators of cell growth. SSAT

may also play a role in metabolic disorders. Thus, its level is strongly increased in the plasma of women who have menstrual cycle irregularities and who may be at risk of pre-eclampsia. In addition, the expression of SSAT is increased in certain precancerous conditions such as oncocytomas of the thyroid, which are associated with a higher
