I am working on a Spring Boot application, I am using Spring 3.2.4.RELEASE with the Spring Rest Controller. There are a lot of links to the API of the same application, and different users and different purpose they have. It's difficult to open this application for everyone because the link is a long and complex URL, so I made a simple version of the application that just use JQuery and a JS function to change the URL and open the right server for each user. The problem is that I get the same response for all the API links. I believe that the Spring Boot server is just one server and I need to set up multiple instances of it to work with the dynamic URLs. I saw that there are some packages that can help for this purpose, but none of them worked for me. Is there any package to solve this problem? In my case, the Spring boot server is an embedded Jetty. A: I think you're looking for the Spring Session feature. With this, there is no need to open multiple connections to the same Spring Boot application in order to access different URLs. In the default configuration, when a web browser requests a resource that requires a session to be bound to the request, such as an authenticated REST API, a cookie-based session is created and associated with that request. This is how you can access the same Spring Boot application across multiple simultaneous requests. This way, different URLs will have different sessions and you can have the same backend exposed to your client in multiple different ways. Small, and part-time, it's a network of nine members run by nine-year-old daughter Elizabeth, a lively mix of students at the prestigious Eccles Center for American Studies.
