In the game, there is a Royal Family that rules the Elden Ring. The Royal Family, who embody the essence of the Elden Ring, is composed of exceptionally powerful people who represent the magic powers of the Black Elden. After the Royal Family, there are the Knights of the Elden Ring. They are representatives of the 4 ancient Bloodlines that are the source of the strength of the Elden. There are also people who aspire to become Knights of the Elden Ring. They are called the Tarnished, and they are people who, for some reason, have taken something that belonged to the Elden Ring, as well as the Elden. They are powerful as well, but their motives are different. *The world of Elden Ring is full of interesting content. A huge world awaits your exploration. You can enhance your skills and talents as you proceed further. *The vivid atmosphere, a variety of entertaining quests, and beautiful characters will all await you. *Take on the role of a powerful Knight of the Elden Ring and take part in the thrilling quest. *Because of the story of the Lands Between, the online mode with players from all over the world, and a variety of other contents, the game can be played for free. ©2015-present; Nippon Ichi Software, Inc.Q: Numbered list: Visible list items highlight I want to make the first three list item of a numbered list to highlight when clicked on it. That is, I want to use an approach similar to this: Is it possible to have this kind of coloring for a list item with numbers? A: Instead of using pseudo-classes like :first-child, :nth-child you can manipulate the list item using display: inline or display: inline-block. However you should keep in mind that these options are very limited by the browser. The CSS3 attribute you're looking for is pointer-events: none;. This can be activated with jQuery, for example, as: $('li:first-child').css('pointer-events','none'); But since it's only supported in IE10+ you might want to use this IE support-polyfill, which gives similar support as display: inline-block. While you could create multiple li elements, I think this could be very confusing to the user. Since it makes no sense to have an anchor element inside a

Features Key:

Play the Age of Myth after the fantasy adventure game This world lies in reality in the Lands Between where the balance between light and dark races is decisively shifting. The scorching sun is glaring ceaselessly, while teams of black bat-like creatures are stealing people away from the residents to protect the power of the dark gods. The continent of Elnis is the setting of Elden Ring. The creators' original vision was a world that depicted the struggle of light and dark as it existed in reality. Full of depth in terms of gameplay and story Elden Ring offers an incredibly intricate storyline. The core of the Elder Tale is a multilayered story that unfolds in fragments. In addition, by collecting materials and key words, you can delve into the world of Elden Ring, where the various thoughts of the characters intersect. Large-Scale Transformation Fight, overcome, start over, repeat. In Elden Ring, you will burn through the remnants of the broken-down continent of Elnis once and for all. You will experience an unbelievably epic fantasy action RPG saga that is overflowing with an astounding variety of gameplay and content.

Download ELDEN RING game freeQ: Multiple connections to one DB I am making an application with an SQL Server database. The database is needed to hold information regarding a bunch of algorithms and their corresponding parameters in a similar fashion to a spreadsheet. Every algorithm should have its own connection to the database, so that they can be manipulated separately. My first approach was to make a new connection to the database for each algorithm, to ensure that the database is not shared with another algorithm. However, this seems very inefficient. Should I really make one connection to the database, and just add a select query for every algorithm in my program? A: This really depends on a number of things, but on the surface, most of the algorithms won't be manipulating the same data, so you can decide on a simple architecture, which allows them to work with their data in isolation. For instance, you could have a table, with a single column to store a unique Algorithm ID. Each algorithm could maintain a reference to that primary key. You would then have a table to store the Algorithm Parameters. Each one would have a primary key, algorithm, and maybe a parameter name, description, etc. When each algorithm uses the API, it would simply use the key to get the algorithm parameters, and then pass that information to the API. This would allow a single database connection, allowing any algorithm to perform any operation, with any associated algorithm, without ever sharing that data with any other algorithm. Q: How to autoscroll when out of bounds of video in android? I am displaying a video in an activity. I want to know if there is a way to autoscroll when user is out of boundaries of the video?
