Using the lectin, wheat-germ agglutinin (WGA), immunohistochemistry and electron microscopy, an association between microglia/macrophages and the brain perivascular space was demonstrated. In areas of the brain where the blood-brain barrier is disrupted, WGA-binding microglia/macrophages extended their processes along the brain capillaries, and these cells had particularly close proximity to abluminal aspects of the brain capillary wall. I have no idea how to go about character customization options. What would be the best way to add the ability for a user to create their character but also add customizable options for their character such as how they look, height, race, etc. A: In a lot of games, the customizable options are used to increase replayability. So the focus is on making it easy to mod the game. As for the way to do this, it depends on how you want to support that. If you want to support a scripting language such as Lua, allowing users to modify the game engine in-game with an editor tool, or just simple modification interface, you may want to take a look at the Tiled Map Editor. It supports tile-based maps and allows users to assign properties to tiles and chunks of tile-based maps. If you want something that will take a bit more time and effort to implement, you can create a game level editor in a game engine such as Unity or Unreal that allows users to create game levels. You would need to find an editor that is really good at interactivity - allow the user to click and drag objects, create scripted interactions, etc. This is a very complex task that you can easily spend a lot of time writing. Just a suggestion for how you can create a user-modable game. Another alternative is to have the user manually edit some text file. This may not be as flexible as you would like, but it is a fairly simple task. This is easiest for most engine based systems. As for creating character options, that is pretty much up to you. Just add an option to a system of preferences, and if the options exist, save the character to a file. Alternatively, you may create a database, and create a table. You can then add a column in the character creation process to tell the user the value in the database. You can then populate the database by reading in the text file containing the choices. A: In my experience, the best way to implement customization options is to
