Background I'm stuck with a library that has several dependencies and within all of these there is a requirement that we process the values as they arrive to prevent too many threads from tying up the server. I am new to C#, which is what has given me the most trouble, but I understand that you can use Tasks, and that I should be using this to populate the UI. To do this, I have created an async method that takes a sequence of URLs and returns a sequence of tasks. However, this is the part I am having trouble with because the sequence of URLs will not always be available. I need to return a sequence of tasks in the same order as they arrive. Question What would be the best practice for something like this?

public Task Get(string[] urls, string name) { var sequence = await urls.Select(async url => new Tuple(url, name)).ToListAsync(); return Task.WhenAll(sequence); } A: In C# 6, you can use Tuple's constructor overload to take an IEnumerable as an argument, as the following: public Task Get(string[] urls, string name) { var sequence = await urls.Select(async url => new Tuple(url, name)) .ToArrayAsync(); return Task.WhenAll(sequence); } In C# 5, you can use an array initializer: public Task Get(string[] urls, string name) { var sequence = new[] { (url: url, name: name) }0cc13bf012
