Adobe Photoshop 6 Adobe Photoshop 6, released in October 1998, introduced a revolutionary new user interface that replaced the Microsoft Windows user interface (GUI). Adobe originally developed Photoshop 6 to compete directly with Apple's Macintosh tool, Photoshop. The macOS version, released later in 1998, was Photoshop 6.1. Photoshop 6's interface initially seemed unwieldy and difficult to navigate. It had large menus with notations, icons, tools and palette labels that appeared on a screen much larger than the monitor. The interface was also difficult to customize, requiring time-consuming memorization of specific keyboard shortcuts. After its release, many customers and end-users experienced frustration with the interface and Photoshop's cumbersome nature. Instead of improving the software or its usability, Adobe patched Photoshop 6 to fix its flaws. Adobe Photoshop 6.1 As a result of growing customer complaints, Adobe released an upgrade known as Photoshop 6.1 in March 1999 that addressed interface problems and bugs. However, some interface bugs still remain. In January 2000, the Macintosh version of Photoshop 6.1 was released. An IBM PC version of Photoshop 6.1 followed in May 2000. At this time, the Microsoft Windows version had stopped receiving new improvements. Version 6.1 Photoshop 6.1 introduced all of the major features of Photoshop, and included the following major changes: Photoshop 6.1.2: released in November 2000 Photoshop 6.2: released in September 2001 Photoshop 6.2.0: released in September 2002 Photoshop 7: released in October 2003 Adobe Photoshop Elements: launched in November 2004 Adobe Photoshop CS: released in September 2005 Photoshop CS2: released in April 2007 Photoshop CS3: released in July 2008 Photoshop CS4: released in February 2010 Adobe Photoshop Lightroom: released in November 2012 Version 6.2 Photoshop 6.2 included the following major features: Photoshop 6.2.0: released in September 2001 Photoshop 6.2.1: released in October 2001 Photoshop 6.2.2: released in May 2002 Photoshop 6.3: released in September 2002 Exported from Adobe Photoshop 6.2 are the Old World honey bees are dying of Colony Collapse Disorder, according to a new study published in Nature today. A UK-US team led by Professor Jeremy Kerr from the University of Manchester's School of Earth and Environment, found that the famous honey bee has reached a critical level of inbreeding that is causing the decline of colonies in their native range. Honey bees visit flowers to collect pollen and nectar for their natural food source, but they are extremely valuable to human society as they play a key role in pollination and maintain the ecosystem. They contribute to agricultural production and boost the global food supply. In 2008, the worldwide population of honey bees collapsed by 50%, and this has become a real concern for scientists and beekeepers. The team studied bees from across the UK, from July to November 2011, by visiting hives with an analysis of worker bees, found that up to 30% of these bees were reproductively incompatible in their colonies, increasing the risk of them not contributing to breeding. The team found that bees with two incompatible queen mates had a 60% chance of dying. They also found that up to 45% of the queens were becoming unable to lay eggs. This can occur when a queen is being chased by bees and she drops off the comb. This results in less than half of the brood being reared. The authors also found that in Southern areas bees became inbred at a level equivalent to the UK at the end of the 19th century. As a consequence of the honey bee population collapsing, much of the crops that require pollination are being affected. Crop production worldwide is dependent on pollination, and therefore the commercial honey bee industry contributes 1% of global gross domestic product. Recent research indicates that the commercial honey bee is the species most commonly affected by CCD, but other species are also affected. Professor Kerr said: "The number of honey bees has been dropping steadily since its peak around 1950. We have seen a 50% drop in the world honey bee population over the last 30 years. It will be interesting to see how this is reflected in the subsequent crop pollination, as a decline in bee population is associated with a decline in crop production. We hope this study will help build the case for additional measures to help bees in the future." Professor Steven Geller, from the school's School of Chemistry and Department of Environmental Sciences and Technology in the University of Manchester, explained: "A healthy honey bee colony is a complex structure of
