We will continue to shut down any sites that peddle racist and antisemitic conspiracy theories about the Jewish influence in America. in the substrate is reduced. By the same token, a high pressure processing gas such as a corrosive gas is likely to be supplied in a larger amount, and if the resistivity of the through-hole in the substrate is lower than that of the Cu plated layer in the through-hole, this high pressure processing gas is flown therethrough so that its resistivity is extremely reduced, thereby making the through-hole to a low-resistance layer. When the high pressure processing gas is supplied to the through-hole in the substrate, the film formation temperature of the substrate is determined by the thermoelectrochemical equilibrium that is maintained by heating elements and supplying means disposed in the chamber of the processing apparatus. It is necessary for a tungsten material to be used as an electrode material for the heating elements so as to maintain the temperature of the heating elements at a suitable level. A tungsten electrode has excellent corrosion resistance to the high pressure processing gas used for cleaning, and exhibits a superior etching characteristic. However, when the tungsten electrode is used for the heating element, such an alloy metal or an oxide film is formed on the surface of the tungsten electrode due to reactions between the high pressure processing gas and the
