download, Posters. Ebook Reader 2013.Q: Multiple /etc/cron.d/sites-enabled files I have read that some web servers offer multiple sites-enabled files, one for each different configuration. For example, the nginx documentation says: Each site has its own files inside the sites-enabled directory, where the site name is prepended by the suffix configuration_number. Is this intended behavior? E.g., if I make 1 (as opposed to 2) changes to the httpd.conf file in sites-enabled, the first one will take effect immediately, but any second change I make will not take effect until the next cron run? A: Yes, this is intended behavior. The default behavior is that cron will read one file in the directory, so if there is more than one, it will only execute the first one.
You can either have cron read all of them, or you can tell it to only read a specific one. If you add an entry like this: 10 * * * * root /bin/sh -c "
