Outcomes of Endovascular Treatment of Symptomatic Intracranial Arteriovenous Malformation Without Magnetic Resonance Imaging-Pitfalls in Assessment of Dural Sinus and Perforator Anatomy. Endovascular management of intracranial arteriovenous malformations (AVMs) is now widely established as an effective treatment option. However, the choice of the therapeutic technique and the approach to pre-operative imaging are based on the absence of cavernous sinus invasion. If AVM is suspected for its involvement of the cavernous sinus, magnetic resonance imaging (MRI) is performed to assess its extension and to plan treatment. In many cases, pre-operative imaging cannot precisely assess the extent of the AVM and the relationship with the dural sinuses, and cavernous sinus invasion cannot be accurately assessed. The aim of this study was to report our findings of endovascular treatment of symptomatic AVMs based on clinical outcome and radiological success, in patients with dural sinus and perforator involvement or compression but lack of cavernous sinus invasion. We analyzed the clinical presentation and treatment of 71 patients with intracranial AVMs who underwent endovascular treatment between October 2006 and April 2016 in our institution. After a mean follow-up period of 20.6 ± 19.6 months, we had a 100% angiographic treatment success rate. The only complication related to the endovascular treatment was the lesion hemorrhage in one patient. We have detected four patients with a complete dural fistula after endovascular treatment. In our series, pre-treatment angio-MRI failed to identify a dural sinus or perforator invasion in a large proportion of the patients. Lesion size or location in the basal arachnoid plane could explain the absence of cavernous 595f342e71
