The study found that more than half of the tested elderly people did not benefit from the antidepressants, and that a quarter of the tested elderly people who received the medications died. The study was published in the Journal of General Internal Medicine. The study's findings raise several issues in elderly care. What is the long-term cost of prescribing unnecessary antidepressants for elderly people? Are the long-term side effects of antidepressants as dangerous as the drugs themselves? The Washington Post describes the study results, and the study itself, in an article entitled Study Finds Half of Elderly Patients Who Take Antidepressants do not Benefit: Overall, the study found that half of elderly people who took antidepressants did not benefit from the drugs, and one in four died on antidepressants. Older adults in particular have been prescribed antidepressants at high rates, perhaps because doctors have been concerned that they don't understand that cognitive side effects of these drugs tend to disappear as people age. Well, at least the National Institute of Health recognizes that older people may benefit from antidepressants, and the drug manufacturers are also encouraging doctors to take a wait

We recently had a wonderful visitor! Celebrating her Birthday this month, we got the opportunity to ask Jennifer Christy, best-selling author of THE LION KING MOVIE, to share her expertise on raising kids. Predictably, her answers were spot on, so we'd like to share them with you here. She also graciously let us post her book "Back to School: A Child's Guide to Success" to it's first author, Trent Herin, on the same subject. This
