In routine practice, regular assessments of blood pressure (BP) are conducted at the patient's home, which is used by the patient as a decision-making tool to initiate therapy. Self-measurements must be considered to be reliable and valid. Ambulatory BP monitoring is considered as the reference method, and BP values from the home are only used to confirm or exclude the diagnosis. There are several methods to obtain BP values. When using the home and ambulatory BP, a close relationship is shown. However, the method and precision of measurement are very important. Using the home BP, as a reference, the ambulatory BP is the basis of any conclusion. The Shell of a Fire-Resistant TV - slowenough ===== slowenough Could you imagine opening this up on your iPhone to read while relaxing on a massage table in a dimly-lit massage parlor? If you can relate, you can read more on the website. There's no doubt this is a great invention, but the Royal Society of Engineering (Journal of the Royal Society of Engineers, vol. 139, no. 4, p. 279) confirms that: 'Tightly wound coils, and in particular ferro-fluidic (ferromagnetic fluidic) coils, used for diverse applications such as coolant in power stations, inductors in high-voltage circuit breakers, and flywheels for energy storage, are well-established and reliable. However, the materials used are often expensive, requiring careful selection and characterisation in order to guarantee that the winding properties remain stable, and localised corrosion is a constant threat.' The shell of a fire-resistant TV is something most of us have never seen before
