Transmission of insect repellents: behavior of four species of Diptera in a flume. The water current created by a flume markedly affected the behavior of four species of midge (Chironomidae), Anatsea communis (L.), Nasella annulipes (Walker), Phocarcia ventralis (Meigen), and Ceratopogonidae. The presence of water significantly altered the behavior of species having large hind legs. Specifically, C. ventralis ran uphill to the left for all but one of the trials, up the incline, and walked upstream in a U-shaped loop. M. annulipes and P. ventralis both climbed upward with their legs extended. M. annulipes was less sensitive to light than were the other species, being attracted to it only when the current was flowing. Individual variation in species' behavior was observed. The results suggest that the microclimate created by the flume would allow the persistence and reproduction of most dipterans, if used in the design of an early warning system for insect repellent compounds.Q: Sitecore Site Data Context I'm trying to obtain my data in the Sitecore item but it is not being found.
