When use initComponents function of react component,callback must be called.But it not call it. I used Reactify.js before and my code work well. React.Component.prototype.constructor = function() { this._toggle = React.addons.EventHandler.create(this._onToggle); React.Component.prototype.constructor.apply(this, arguments); }; React.Component.prototype._onToggle = function() { alert("test"); setSomeData(this); } function func() { React.renderComponent( , document.getElementById("div") ); } In the above code, _onToggle execute in all page.But _toggle execute only in called function. A: The event handler should exist when the component is rendered. If you want to delay that, you can use setTimeout. this._toggle = React.addons.EventHandler.create(this._onToggle); setTimeout(function() { React.renderComponent( , document.getElementById("div") ); }, 0); Or you can use useRef hook for the element that will hold the onToggle event. ref._toggle = React.addons.EventHandler.create(this._onToggle)}>; and then call it from your _onToggle handler. setTimeout(() => { React.renderComponent(, document.getElementById("div")); }, 0); News SEATTLE

The problem, of course, is that the money for the capital's new landmark buildings flows with a vengeance through a number of very large construction firms. There were 540 new developments between 2009 and 2011 and, of these, just five were affordable or 100% owned by a "responsible developer". The result of this is that, at a time when many are warning of an affordable housing crisis, some developers are now relying on the outside world — British banks, in particular — to make sure the buildings they build are affordable. It sounds strange to say so, but there is evidence to suggest that banks are now acting as life insurance companies for the high-end residential property sector. They are buying loans for what are effectively "death-insurance policies" that guarantee them to the lender in the unlikely event that the building goes wrong, all of which is helping to prop up prices even as affordability is eroding. The figures, compiled by Barclays, underline the extent to which the markets for residential property in London and the south-east have become very, very different. The £6.1bn of loans Barclays bought for Barclays Clapham during the last quarter — including both 99% and 75% loans — totalled just 15% of the company's total lending. The figures show that by comparison, the five 75% loans that were bought by smaller debt-to-value structures represented just 2.5% of Barclays' whole portfolio. The figures also show the scale of the problem. While Barclays deals with high-end borrowers, there are some 17,000 borrowers across the asset class. The company's loans average £11m and 95% of the loans being bought are for £1m and up. The peak was

In the front-end, I am using axios to send a POST request to the back-end to update a cookie. The cookie is updated, and then the user is redirected back to the homepage.
