cancer immunotherapy. In contrast to most other cancers, which are relatively resistant to immune-based therapies, patients with metastatic melanoma have been shown to have a significant and sustained response to immunotherapy, which by definition has an established antitumor effect. This chapter describes important factors to consider in developing an effective cancer vaccine against metastatic melanoma. After a description of the importance of measuring immune effector function, mechanisms to enhance immune-mediated anti-tumor immunity are detailed, such as safety considerations and molecular approaches to increase vaccine immunogenicity. The importance of translating preclinical evidence into clinical trials in human patients is presented, and approaches to evaluate the efficacy of a cancer vaccine to induce long-term protective immunity against metastatic melanoma in patients are described. Humanized mouse models are used to investigate the use of cancer vaccines in preclinical studies. These models are also used to perform immunomonitoring of patients to evaluate the efficacy of cancer vaccines in human clinical trials. Examples of murine models are also presented.

Luke Plunkett There's good news for those who love movies about eye diseases. Starting next year, the world will get to see a new blockbuster about Tristan Rector, the actor who portrayed Cyril "Cyril" Quay of The Man with Two Brains. Cyril Quay was a man born blind who could "see" by tapping objects with his head and hand. He was befriended by Kip Russell (voice of David), a man who studied speech to the deaf and who in turn befriended Cyril. This friendship led to an unusual friendship between Cyril and an almost blind boy named Roberta, who was on the verge of losing her eyesight. Now owned by Disney, the film is being released on DVD on Feb. 17. A number of reviews have praised the film for its message about the importance of universal access to education and its value in developing independence. A number of others have panned it for using a stereotypical character who speaks in a very thick Alabama accent in his depiction of a deaf character. I've also seen positive reviews about the film for its depiction of a deaf character who was raised in a deaf household. The film is directed by Matthew Robbins and stars Tristan R
