The rapid identification of atypical organisms, in particular, is essential in isolating patients before the beginning of specific antimicrobial therapy. The CDC recommends that diagnostic microbiology laboratories use standard laboratory techniques for the isolation and identification of many of these organisms. We evaluated the EZ NA kit (Biomanex) for the identification of selected human pathogens commonly recovered from clinical specimens submitted to our microbiology laboratory. Our evaluation included a variety of clinical specimens, microorganisms and their growth conditions. In general, based on the results of this study, the EZ NA kit is more useful than the standard laboratory technique for the recovery of bacterial
